The Lost Ring.

BY A RETIRED ATTORNEY.

" Mr. Docket ?"

" Yes, Madam." It was an elderly woman, upon whose brow care had furrowed many a wrinkle. She was dressed in homely garments, and the struggle between penury and neatness which they evinced would have been an interesting study for a philosopher. Her eyes were red, as though she had been weeping; and when she seated herself by my desk, the pent-up current of her grief burst forth afresh.

"What is the matter, my good woman? You seem to be in deep distress," I remarked, in the most encouraging tones I could command. "I am, sir. They say the Lord is near to them that are in suffering, and I am sure He ought to be very near to me." "I dare say He is ma'am. But you know that afflictions are sent to us for our own good, and we ought never to repine at the discipline of life, however severe it may sometimes seem to us."

I had heard an excellent sermon the day beforefor it was Monday-on Tribulation, and I was just in the frame of mind for giving others most excellent advice, which, perhaps, I should have been very un-willing to follow if the dark waves of trouble had rolled over me.

"I try to bear it as well as I can," she replied, wiping away her tears with the corner of her apron. 'I don't know as I am acquainted with you, ma'am," I suggested, for the purpose of changing the topic, and bringing her to business.

" I don't know as you are," she replied ; and she proceeded to give me a very long and very succinct account of her previous history, beginning back some forty years, when she was born among the White Mountains in New Hampshire. I tried to check her, but it was no use. I was as patient as the case would admit, and mindful of the duty we owe to the weak, the infirm, and the ignorant; but my patience was sorely tried. I will not punish the reader with the long, fine spun story she told me, for a few lines will suffice to inform him of the material facts.

She was a widow, and her name was Marche. She had an only son, Philip, who was employed in an insurance office, and received three dollars a week for his services. He was a good boy and loved his mother, as a son should. Upon their united earnings they lived very comfortably in an obscure street, where they hired two rooms. Mrs. Marche's cataogue of her son's virtue was certainly very edifying. He never spent a cent upon himself, never went out nights, and attended church forenoon and afternoon. An evil day had come. On the Saturday three weeks preceding, Mr. Carmen, the president of the Insurance Company, as he declared, had sent Philip with a very valuable diamond ring to the jeweler's, to have the stone reset. On enquiry, the ring was found not to have reached the destination. The jeweler had never seen it. To make the case more complicated still, Philip denied having received the ring. Mr. Carmen had never sent him on any such

The boy had been arrested on the charge of stealing the ring, and was now confined in jail. Mr. Carmen was ready to swear he had delivered the valuable article into the hands of the boy, with explicit directions as to where he should carry it, and what should be done with it. It looked like a bad case. The poor woman was in the deepest distress. She was sure her darling boy was innocent of the crime. She knew he wouldn' steal. I pitied her, and promised to do what I could

When she had gone, I called on Mr. Carmen. I found that he was one of those still, dogmatic old fellows, who are never in the wrong, who find it impossible to err, even by design, or to make a mistake. Everybody is in the wrong but himself. I tried to argue the point with him, but he would not say much. He told me the story; was sure he sent the ring by the boy, and by nobody else. I ventured to suggest that he might be mistaken ;

that he had sent the ring by some other person. " Do you take me for a simpleton, sir? Do you think I don't know what I am about?" he exclaimed, bestowing upon me such a look of withering contempt. "I sent the ring by the boy, sir. The boy has stolen it. Nothing more need be said, sir ;" and he turned to the newspaper be had been reading.

I was not much pleased with the interview. I was vexed at the haughty, overbearing manner of the old fellow; and I confess that my pique rendered me tenfold more zealous in my endeavors to clear my

I visited Philip at the jail. He was very sad on his mother's account; on his own, he seemed not to care. A more frank, open-hearted boy I never saw. He told his story, and though I questioned him pret-ty severely, he was consistent to the last. I made the case my own, and worked unceasingly, as it seemed to me then, for the overthrow of the haughty president of the Insurance Company, as much as for the salvation of the widow and her interesting son. I visited more than a dozen jeweler's shops that afternoon and the next morning ; with what results the reader shall learn in the details of the trial, which came on the next day. Philip was duly arraigned, and his poor mother sat by my side, weeping and sobbing like a child as the case proceeded. Mr. Carmen, with a majestic dignity stepped on the stand. He told the story I have I efore detailed, and was turned over to ne for cross-examination. I could see that he was nettled, for he certainly could read no mercy in my face." " Mr. Carmen, you are willing to swear that you gave the ring to the boy ?"

"Certainly, I am," he replied, vexed and angry, for he had answered the same question a dozen times in the course of the cross-examination " I beg your honor to notice particularly the words of this witness," I remarked to the court.

His honor testily replied that he had noticed them, as a matter of course; he had them in his minutes; and he rather snubbed me for pressing so respectable a witness in so severe a manner. " Now, Mr. Carmen, may I beg you to examine this ring?" and I handed him the one he had lost. "It is mine," he replied, with evident astonish-

" You identify the ring, do you, sir ?" "That is all, sir. May it please your honor, I shall bring but one witness for the defence.-Will Mr. Graham take the stand ?" Mr. Graham took the stand. I showed him the " State to the court what you know about it ." Mr. Graham proceeded to say that he was a jeweler, that the ring was left at his shop three weeks before by an elderly gentleman, to have the stone reset. "Is the gentleman in the court room?" I asked. "He is. There he sits;" and he pointed to Mr.

" Have you ever seen this ring before?"

The court was astonished; the officers were astonished; and Mr. Carmen was overwhelmed with confusion. He acknowledged his error, when there was no possibility of concealing it. He asked to correct his testimony, and did so.

Mr. Carmen was a very absent-minded man; and the solution of the whole matter is, that he forgot all the circumstances connected with the ring. He intended to have sent Philip to the jeweler's with it, and actually called him for that purpose; but his attention was distracted by something else, and he thought no more about it. On his way home to dinner, while his mind was completely absorbed by an important business operation, he had left the ring at Mr. Graham's. The impression that he had given the ring to Philip, and directed him to carry it to Jones, Low & Ball's was fastened upon his mind. He remembered the fact of calling him, and his intention became a reality.

When thus cornered, he amused the judge with several other instances of absent-mindedness of which he had been guilty, in this manner explaining the gross mistake he had made. I must do him the justice to say that he made Philip ample amends in the shape of a hundred dollar bill for the trouble he had caused him ; but I believe that Mr. Carmen hated me to the day of his death. I can only say I should not have punished him so severely, if he had treated me like a gentleman.
